Rivals Await Blankfein's Bonus at Goldman Sachs

By GRAHAM BOWLEY and ZACHERY KOUWE

The compensation for Lloyd C. Blankfein will set a new benchmark for pay throughout the industry.

Voice-mail boxes inside Goldman Sachs lit up on Jan. 21 with an unusual message from the bank's chief executive — a bit of Wall Street speak that sounded like the makings of a book on Zen and the Art of Money-Making.

"In a year that proved to have no shortage of story lines, I believe very strongly that performance is the ultimate narrative," the chief, Lloyd C. Blankfein, said in the companywide message. He then celebrated the bank's record profits in 2009 and discussed its plans to pay bonuses to its employees.

Left unanswered now, as then, is the question that all of Wall Street has been chewing on for months: How much will Mr. Blankfein be paid for his remarkable — and controversial — success in running Goldman?

Anxious executives at rival banks are awaiting the news with a mixture of envy and alarm. Guesses range from nothing to $100 million. Whatever the final figure is — high, low, or somewhere in between — it will set a new benchmark for pay throughout the industry. Goldman Sachs insisted on Wednesday that no decision had been made. Goldman employees offered various interpretations of Mr. Blankfein's voice-mail message, one of dozens that he has left since becoming chief in 2006. Many agreed on one point, however: The message was somehow linked to the uproar in Washington and elsewhere across the country over resurgent profits and pay at big banks like Goldman.
